From the Chair and President

Thirty years ago, land trusts joined forces to found the Land Trust Alliance. That was the beginning. That was the moment when we promised to do whatever we could to help land trusts save land.

We've come a long way since 1982. America's 1,700 land trusts now have 12,000 staff, 15,000 board members and 5 million members from every walk of life. Together, we have protected more than 47 million acres, 10 million of which were added in just the last five years.

We've come a long way, but our most important work is still ahead of us. We need to accelerate the pace, improve the quality, and ensure the permanence of land conservation in the United States. With your help, we will. We already are.

In the following pages, you will hear the stories of four land trusts that helped found the Land Trust Alliance. They will talk about their work to increase the pace, quality and permanence of their conservation. You will also learn how partnerships between the Alliance and its members created new federal tax incentives, accreditation, legal defense insurance and training for a new generation of conservation leaders, transforming the effectiveness of land conservation in America.

We've protected millions of acres, connected with communities and strengthened public trust and support for land conservation. Working together, we will do even more in the next 30 years.

LAND TRUST ALLIANCE SUCCESSSES

- Recruited more than 300 House co-sponsors—majorities of both parties—and more than 100 organizations in support of the enhanced federal tax incentive for conservation donations.
- Built a campaign for funding land trust purchases of conservation easements in the Farm Bill that resulted in the Agriculture committees proposing $1 billion in funding despite billions of dollars of cuts elsewhere.
- Organized land trusts in the fight that reversed draconian cuts to the Land and Water Conservation Fund passed by the House in early 2011, and actually increased its funding for 2012.
- Mobilized the land trust community to develop more and closer relationships with their representatives in Congress.
- Maintained state funding for the New York State Conservation Partnership Program at $1,575,000, resulting in 80 matching grants to 57 land trusts.

Voices Heard Together

Sherri Evans-Stanton

“Land conservation is a unifying concept—one that generates strong bipartisan support,” says Sherri Evans-Stanton, director of the Environmental Management Center at Brandywine Conservancy, and president of the board of the Pennsylvania Land Trust Association.

“We are very thankful to Congressman Jim Gerlach (R-PA), who was one of the lead co-sponsors on legislation that will make permanent a tax incentive that helps landowners conserve important natural, agricultural and historic resources in our community and throughout the nation,” says Sherri. The legislation has received overwhelming support from Congress, with more than 300 U.S. Representatives—including majorities of both parties—co-sponsoring “The Conservation Easement Incentive Act.”

Sherri knows firsthand how important the incentive is to conservation. “Over 95% of the conservation easements held by the Brandywine Conservancy have been donated by landowners, many of whom benefited from tax incentives.” She explains that Rep. Gerlach and many of his colleagues “understand the critical importance of protected open space and its value to our local communities. We greatly appreciate their leadership and support on conservation issues.”

“There are tangible benefits when the land trust community gets together as a group to influence policy,” says Sherri, who believes the Land Trust Alliance provides a valuable opportunity for land trusts to speak in unison. “When our voices are heard together, people pay attention.”

Like many land trusts, the Brandywine Conservancy is involved in regional policy issues that often reach beyond their service area.

In response to proposed federal energy policies that would facilitate the creation of many new high-voltage transmission power lines across America, the Brandywine Conservancy worked in partnership with the Land Trust Alliance, Pennsylvania Land Trust Association, Piedmont Environmental Council and others to advocate that permanently protected lands be avoided during the siting process. While Congress did not enact legislation, a federal court overturned two National Interest Electric Transmission Corridors, and the conservation community was given a seat at the table by federal regulators for the Eastern Interconnection Planning Collaborative. This work would not have been possible without the participation of numerous organizations and the Land Trust Alliance.

“Beginning in 1979, when the Brandywine Conservancy hosted the first get-together of land trusts to discuss how we should prepare for the expiration of easement legislation in 1980, it became obvious that land trusts had to develop a unified voice to meet new challenges. We quickly learned that to succeed over time, we would have to have an organization that would develop standards for easements and appraisals and advance the state of the art in landsaving.”

A Sense of Unity

David MacDonald and John Hoffnagle

“I want my kids to be able to enjoy nature the way I did when I was growing up,” says David MacDonald, director of land protection at the Maine Coast Heritage Trust (MCHT). “Their future is a big part of why I do this work, and why the quality of land conservation matters so much.”

One way to ensure quality is through accreditation. The Land Trust Accreditation Commission, an independent program of the Land Trust Alliance established in 2006, awards the accreditation seal to community institutions that meet national quality standards for protecting important natural places and working lands forever.

“I’m a great believer in accreditation,” says David, who served as a founding accreditation commissioner. Now MCHT—accredited in 2010—and the Land Trust Alliance help other land trusts prepare for the process through the Maine Land Trust Excellence Program.

The process is rigorous but the benefits are tangible. “Everyone I’ve talked to who’s come through the program has said that it has made their organizations stronger,” says David.

John Hoffnagle,¹ senior director of land protection at the Land Trust of Napa County (LTNC), would agree. LTNC is preparing to apply, and John is already seeing benefits. “It’s getting us ship-shape, and we’re not even there yet.”

“Being an old-timer, I can tell you that the old days were about ‘dollars and acres.’ There was no component of quality.” John believes that refocusing on quality—whether through Land Trust Standards and Practices or the accreditation process—can guide land trusts through difficult periods and challenging decisions. For example, when the economy collapsed shortly after LTNC took on a capital campaign to protect 4,000 acres, it was their focus on the quality of the land that kept them going. “The reason we got through it was because our fundamentals were sound,” says John.

Accreditation and Land Trust Standards and Practices do more than affirm quality in land trusts. They also provide a sense of unity.

“What the Maine Coast Heritage Trust does is really different from what we do, but the Standards and Practices tie us together,” says John. “I know we are all working off the same playbook.”

“We were a small handful of land-saving practitioners coming together for the first time. Imagine how exhilarating it was, after working alone in uncharted territory, to join forces with colleagues and give birth to the land trust movement! Diverse, strong and passionate personalities worked in unison to build the Land Trust Alliance’s solid and high-minded foundation. I’m honored to have been there with that remarkable group of people.”

JOAN VILMS, founding board member of the Land Trust Alliance, formerly with the Land Trust of Napa County

LAND TRUST ALLIANCE SUCCESSES

- Delivered services to help land trusts prepare for accreditation, including workshops, organizational assessments, small grants and direct coaching assistance. Twenty-two land trusts were awarded accreditation in 2011, plus 23 this spring, and many more are in the application process. See the list of 158 accredited land trusts on the back cover.
- Built strong land trusts by delivering training to almost 3,000 people through Rally, workshops and webinars, thanks to our faculty of more than 275 presenters, our Alliance-trained cadre of instructor-consultants, and numerous partner organizations.
- Expanded use of The Learning Center, the go-to website for land conservation, and increased the number of land trusts signed up for Pathways to Accreditation by 50%.
- Launched Land Trust Board Services to help board members be strong leaders for their organizations.
- Increased land trust capacity through “excellence” programs throughout the country, providing them with integrated capacity-building services.

LAND TRUST ALLIANCE SUCCESES

- Organized TerraFirma Risk Retention Group LLC, the conservation defense insurance program owned by and for land trusts to uphold conservation permanence.
- Expanded the conservation defense clearinghouse with 10 new custom collections of legal documents, including the Federal Volunteer Protection Act, transfer fees, lender agreements and IRS insights on technical compliance.
- Facilitated a national network of conservation experts disseminating timely practical analysis and guidance on trends, challenges, legislation, cases and regulations affecting conservation.
- Built broad public support for conservation through national media covering the Land Trust Census, showing an increase of 10 million protected acres since 2005 and a doubling of the amount of funding that land trusts have dedicated to monitoring, stewardship and legal defense.
- Shaped the land conservation message to highlight the critical resources land brings to our communities: clean air and water, fresh local food, habitat for plants and animals, and places to refresh our minds and bodies.

Pictured: Iowa Natural Heritage Foundation's High Trestle Trail project includes an iconic bridge over the Des Moines River. Mark Ackelson says, "The trail is drawing thousands of visitors and getting people of all abilities and socio-economic backgrounds into nature while also providing significant economic benefits to local communities and public health."

Standing Strong

Mark Ackelson

Mark Ackelson is very enthused about Terrafirma Risk Retention Group LLC, the new insurance program owned and operated by and for land trusts. “This has been a dream of many in the land trust community for decades,” says Mark, president of the Iowa Natural Heritage Foundation. He would know. He was one of those who helped found the Land Trust Alliance 30 years ago.

The premise behind Terrafirma is simple. As with every insurance program, Terrafirma shares risk across a wide member base. That shared risk, however, is unique. Terrafirma’s sole purpose is to support land trusts as they defend their conservation easements and land against legal challenges.

Land trusts, foundations, donors and the general public (because of tax deductions) have billions of dollars invested in voluntarily conserved lands nationwide. “Some of these lands are extremely valuable,” says Mark, who explains that rising property values and changing land use patterns present a significant and increasing threat for the permanence of conservation easements. As land values rise, so do the incentives for developers or landowners to disrupt or void those easements. Ultimately, every land trust may face litigation. These legal battles can cost hundreds of thousands of dollars. That leaves the vast majority of land trusts vulnerable to legal challenges.

“The Conservation Defense Center and Terrafirma will all help protect against that threat,” says Mark. “When you measure the success of the insurance program, it’ll be the number of conservation easement lands that are successfully protected.”

“This insurance can help us be stronger organizations,” says Mark. Already, 467 land trusts—with 18,544 conservation properties—have committed to the program. The Iowa Natural Heritage Foundation is one of those land trusts. “I knew great things would come from the land trust community working together, and Terrafirma is one of them.”

“When the Land Trust Alliance was created 30 years ago, we never could have envisioned its extraordinary effectiveness and success in furthering the explosion of land conservation across America. From the early network of land trusts that banded together to share the costs of attorney Kingsbury Browne’s tax law advisory services, to the land conservation movement of today, the Alliance has been a unifying force for the permanence of protected land.”

BEN EMORY, founding board member and second executive director of the Land Trust Alliance, formerly with Maine Coast Heritage Trust

The Future Leaders of Our Movement

By Alan M. Bell

Growing up the youngest of 10 children in East Chicago, Indiana, a gritty, industrial town on Lake Michigan, my exposure to vast amounts of open space was somewhat limited. But my mother always had a garden flourishing in the front yard and my father proudly nursed his vegetable garden in the back yard. At a very young age I was inspired to explore nature and to work to protect it, especially in inner-city urban areas.

My parents created their gardens because they grew up connected to the land in the small town of Columbia, Mississippi, surrounded by farms and lush forests. And they passed their love of the land on to me. But the torch grows dimmer with each successive generation. In an age inundated with the Internet, social media, video games and so many other options, it becomes a challenge today for many young people to have the same nature experiences that I had in my youth. As the growing amount of media and social options clamoring for the attention of the younger generation becomes the “new norm,” how can we cultivate the next generation of conservation leaders?

First, it’s important that the conservation community recognize that the demographics of our country are evolving—we are becoming more and more ethnically diverse, people of influence are younger than in the past, and the way that people communicate and connect is more instantaneous, intertwined and international. Second, we must mentor young people, teach them the value of conservation to all human beings, and support them with the training they need to develop into the leaders of tomorrow.

Ultimately, to solidify the long-term foundation of the next generation of conservation leaders, there must be a strong sense of ownership by younger people and diverse communities of the mission and vision of land conservation. They must not only experience it, they must feel they truly “own” a part of it and believe that maintaining a connection to the land is essential to their lives.

Given the recent success of new engagement and leadership initiatives by the Land Trust Alliance and land trusts across the country, I’m very optimistic that the untapped energy of our youth and diverse communities bodes well for the sustainability of the land conservation movement.

“For my entire adult life, I’ve supported private, voluntary land conservation. Because I felt so strongly about this type of conservation, I made a major career change six years ago in which I went from law firm president to land trust executive director.

Supporting the Land Trust Alliance, through individual contributions of cash and a planned gift in my will, seems like a natural and necessary extension of my embrace of conservation in my own community. Local conservancies need the Land Trust Alliance. By implementing Land Trust Standards and Practices, participating in Alliance training, and benefiting from Alliance lobbying for conservation-friendly legislation, our local efforts are greatly reinforced and magnified.

Everyone benefits from the conservation of natural areas, working farms and forests. We owe a debt of gratitude and support to the Land Trust Alliance for cementing our individual conservation efforts together into a larger and stronger whole.

Through my planned gift to the Alliance, I am assured of an opportunity to promote and strengthen private, voluntary conservation long after I’m gone from this land, which I value so deeply.”

“The Department of Defense’s partnership with the Land Trust Alliance is a wonderful example of a win-win-win that benefits local communities, the environment and national defense. Working with the Alliance and its member land trusts has helped DoD’s Readiness and Environmental Protection Initiative increase the quality, pace and permanence of land conservation near our military installations. We are grateful for our partnership with the Alliance and look forward to continuing to save land that protects military readiness and cherished natural places.”

“The Land Trust Alliance provides a powerhouse of intellectual capital in the form of nationally recognized experts experienced in various aspects of the conservation of private lands, including legal, tax and community relations issues. The Alliance is a key resource to accessing a powerful network of 1,700 land trusts that are working in local communities nationwide.”

LAURA J. NAPOLI, Land Management/Remediation Program Manager, ExxonMobil Biomedical Sciences, Inc.

LAND TRUST ALLIANCE FACULTY

"In August 2010, we became the second land trust in Connecticut to achieve accreditation. During the application process our entire board really pulled together. With only one part-time staffer, the directors relied on Land Trust Alliance publications and The Learning Center, and gained a strong appreciation for the Alliance's role in setting the bar for, and providing support to, land conservation organizations nationally. Our board realized that we could strengthen our commitment to the land conservation movement through individual contributions made by each board member to the Alliance, and we will continue this practice in the future."
